

CRITICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

When service members are deployed in distant locations or recovering from injury, they deserve the peace of mind that comes with knowing their family won't have to weather an urgent financial crisis alone. They can count on Operation Homefront to help.

Operation Homefront's Critical Assistance Program helps military families address financial shortfalls. Most often, this means assistance with mortgage payments, rent, utilities, car repairs, home repairs, overdue bills, critical baby items, and groceries. Our process is managed by professional caseworkers who:

- Validate financial needs before support is provided
- Offer assistance in the form of grants, not loans
- Pay funds directly to service providers, not the family

The Plaza Family

For Jeff Plaza, joining the military was the right thing to do and a family tradition since his father, brother and grandfather also served. The Army sent Jeff all over the Middle East including Iraq, and to Bosnia, Germany, Iceland and other countries.

Jeff considers himself lucky to be alive after some close calls, and to have made it home intact. But he has health issues, possibly related to a vehicle rollover and exposure to gas. He had brain surgery before leaving active duty to address internal bleeding.

Knowing firsthand it's no fun to be a patient made it even harder when his then 2-year-old son was diagnosed with cancer. He and his wife live near Sacramento with their three other children.

"It helped us through a really rough patch. It came at the right time when we couldn't really see a way out."

"There are a lot of challenges, but we're doing our best," said Jeff, which isn't easy because he also got laid off from his job. He applied to Operation Homefront's Critical Assistance Program for help covering expenses. "It helped us through a really rough patch," he said. "It came at the right time when we couldn't really see a way out."

Jeff appreciates that Operation Homefront uses its money conscientiously. "Thanks for operating in a way that's respected," he said. "Not everyone's doing that."

Through our nonprofit partners, those receiving financial assistance with rent and mortgage, utilities, and food are offered financial education to break the cycle of recurring crisis and achieve long-term self-sustainability.
